Ex-Rebel Leader Alleges CIA Vow to Aid Overthrow in Managua

MIAMI, Nov. 26—Late in 1982, as Edgar Chamorro recalls it, an authoritative sounding CIA official told him the Reagan administration had decided to help Nicaraguan exiles overthrow the Sandinista government.

"I remember he said he was speaking on behalf of the president of the United States, who was very interested in getting rid of the Sandinistas," Chamorro said in a review of his two years as a top leader of the U.S.-backed Nicaraguan insurgency.

The official, who introduced himself as "Tony," had flown down from Washington to hold the meeting with Chamorro and similar sessions with other prospective rebel chiefs in a hotel suite overlooking Biscayne Bay, Chamorro said, and he was telling the determined exiles exactly what they wanted to hear about U.S. policy toward their homeland.

Chamorro's recollections of pledges of support for overthrowing the Nicaraguan government are contested by some of his colleagues but corroborated by others. Still others avoided the issue.

The version given by Chamorro, after he was dismissed last week from the rebel movement's top leadership, constitutes one man's version of an exercise in ambiguity: U.S. policy in support of anti-Sandinista rebels. Over the past two years, according to congressional testimony, administration officials and rebel leaders, the policy has been like a mirrored ball: radiating definitions and goals that are shaped by and for the angle of the participants.

"I can imagine they would tell them what they thought was necessary to get them mobilized," an administration official said of the CIA briefings to the rebels, which he said explained U.S. objectives and the "distinctions of motivations" that existed between the CIA and the rebels committed to overthrowing the Managua government.

Congress soon will have to try again to decide what U.S. objectives should be and whether they merit renewal of the U.S. funding cut off last spring. Those involved expect the Reagan administration, armed with its triumph at the polls, to make a concerted effort to keep the anti-Sandinista rebellion going by reviving CIA financing.

Congress refused new funding in February. The rebels have said the CIA pipeline ran dry in June but has been refueled by almost $3 million raised elsewhere.

Congress and the American public were given a variety of explanations for the covert war as circumstances changed, but they were never told what Chamorro says he was told—that the aim of the operation all along had been to topple the Sandinistas by force.

When the administration originally went to Congress for funds in December 1981, the policy was described as a campaign to interdict arms supplies from the Sandinista government to Salvadoran guerrillas, according to a report in May 1983 from the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence.

But "interdict" had a wider meaning than simply seizing arms shipments, the report said. The idea also was to show the Sandinistas that their attempts to promote subversion in El Salvador would be met by subversion at home.

"The end purpose of this support has been stated to be the interdiction of arms flowing through Nicaragua into El Salvador," the report said in a review of the program's history. It has also been explained as an attempt to force the Sandinistas to turn away from support of the Salvadoran insurgency.

An administration source explained that Congress was given a description of the interdiction campaign in both its meanings from the start of CIA support for the rebels.

"From the beginning, we had seen it [the insurgency] as a counterpoint for Nicaragua's actions, to make them cease and desist," an administration source explained. He added, "It would have defied logic for anyone to think that the sole purpose of an anti-Sandinista program was to intercept arms traveling down a trail."

But the report said the administration also supplied a third level of meaning to Congress. In this definition, the insurgents would not only prevent something—arms shipments—they also would produce something—increased willingness within Nicaragua to meet U.S. demands for regional talks and democratization. "Later, other goals—bringing the Sandinistas to the bargaining table and forcing the scheduling of promised elections—were added as ends to be achieved," the report said.

But one definition the program was not supposed to have was overthrowing the Nicaraguan government. The then secret fiscal 1983 intelligence authorization budget bill contained a congressional restriction in its classified annex barring use of the money "to overthrow the government of Nicaragua or provoke a military exchange between Nicaragua and Honduras." The prohibition, first attached when the authorization was voted in secret in April 1982, became public as the Boland amendment in December that year. According to Chamorro, it was about six months after the secret prohibition, and just before the amendment of Rep Ed-
